CHINOOK JARGON ANALYZED.

Origin of the Strange Language and

Its Extensive Use. In that vast district lying between the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific, from San Francisco bay nearly up to Alaska, of which a large part was then generally known as Oregon, dwelt many tribes of Indians, all of the same race, but speaking no less than twelve obsolutely distinct languages, and these languages were again divided up into dialects, many of them so different as to render the speakers of one quite unintelligible to their neighbors on the other side of a range of hills who spoke another. History relates that this ignorance of each other's tongue, says a writen in Chambers' Journal, led to much fighting, and was frequently the cause of the flerce intertribal wars that were then almost continuously waging. The difficulty of the white man who arrived to "trade" may be easily imagined. A sailor dealing with natives soon picks up a few of the simplest words and rapidly makes progress, but his powers are sorely taxed when he sails out of the first river he strikes and into the next, thirty miles off, and finds that the natives there do not understand the words he picked up at his first point of arrival. This difficulty so hampered the early traders that a common language, a Volapuk, was started. And this common jingo is now almost a complete language, and is spoken by natives all over that huge country, which used to be known as Oregon and is called the "Chinook jargon," or "Oregon trade language." This jargon was not made to order and taught in the schools, but gradually grew up as necessities arose, until now at length it has arrived at the dignity of having a dictionary printed all to itself and out of its precocity it has produced a framework which may some day arrive at the dignity of a grammar. The course of its growth is interesting. Nootka Sound, on the west coast of Vancouver island, was the haven to which most ships trading to this coast laid their courses, and here the jargon was cradled. And we find, as might be expected, that many of its most useful words are culled from the tribe that dwelt in that wild and wet districtsuch as kloshe, "good," hyas and tenas, "large" and "small;" kumtuks, "to under-stand;" mahkook, "to trade," and wawa, 'to talk''-these being just the kind of words that would be wanted at first. By degrees other words-words that had a character of their own-from other tribes were

Perhaps it would be fairer to say that the words added from time to time were such as could be pronounced by Europeans. The Indian languages are uncouth and unpronounceable to any one except, perhaps, a Welshman. The names of many articles of European make which came in the way of trade and for which there could clearly be no native word as to fit the curves of a native mouth. "Bed" and "boat" were easy, but "cold" becomes cole, "dry" dly, and that very difficult word, "handkerchief," the gaudy red or yellow one so much prized torical date of the origin of the language is shown by the word for "Englishman," kintshautsh man, which, being done into tinguishes us from our Yankee cousin, who, whether he halled from north or south or east or west of his vast territory, is always

> Meanwhile another element crept in. Across the great prairies of Manitoba and the northwest, over the peaks and through of the Hudson Bay company, the French-Canadian voyager, a man accustomed to deal with Indians, and his individuality is strongly impressed into the jargon, which adopted his words with the article attached. Thus, under the letter "L" in the Chinook vocabulary we find that nearly all the words are French: Lassiet, "a plate;" lashase, "chair;" lemahto, "hammer;" leplet (le pretre), "priest;" Calipeen, "a rifie," and Siwash, "Indian," are from the Franch carabine and sauvage. The imitation of sounds, almost an Indian's chief instinct, has pro-duced a number of words—tintin, "a bell;" tiktik, "a watch," and, most curious of all,

known as a "Boston man."

The well known temperance men of Kirk-aldy, Scotland, were upset the other night when returning from a temperance meeting.

In its account of the mishap the local paper remarked: "Fortunstely both gentlemen were solor at the time." This remark made the mildignant and they wrote a letter to the ditor, saying so. Whereupon the editor sa
